Legal Aid launches response team to stop NYC evictions within 24 hours

BY BARBARA RUSSO-LENNON
brusso@amny.com

The Legal Aid Society launched on Monday its new Emergency Response Team (ERT) designed to provide rapid legal help to New Yorkers who were evicted or facing immediate eviction from their homes.

The team is made up of attorneys, supervisors and paralegals who focus on urgent housing cases, with the goal of intervening within 24 hours. Legal Aid reps said the program is aimed at preventing displacement and homelessness among New Yorkers.

"The impetus for our new unit in the first place was the gap between clients who are eligible for legal services under the right to counsel but aren't getting it and fell through the cracks," explained Munonyedi Clifford, attorney-in-charge of the Citywide Housing Practice at Legal Aid.

Because Legal Aid has the only citywide housing helpline, the organization gets an influx of calls from New Yorkers who need legal help.

"We have so many clients calling us who should have gotten a lawyer but didn't get a lawyer," Clifford said. "By the time they call us, oftentimes, it's too late. So, the team prioritizes cases where clients have already been evicted or about to get evicted, so cases that are the most urgent."

ERT working in the courts

A lot of the work has been taking place in court. The ERT can file emergency court papers seeking to stop an eviction or prevent a landlord from renting out an apartment while a case is pending. Attorneys can also work to bring tenants back to their homes when possible and help them apply for emergency rental assistance to address unpaid rent.

"For tenants facing eviction, a single phone call can be the difference between maintaining stability or losing everything," said Emma Salas, citywide director of the ERT. "The Emergency Response Team ensures that no family is left alone in that critical moment. This is life-changing work that interrupts the pipeline to homelessness."

The team began operating in June 2025, but officially launched on Sept. 21, according to the organization. In just over a year, Legal Aid reps said the team has prevented or reversed the loss of housing in 111 cases, while 59 cases remain pending. It also secured nearly $2 million in housing-related assistance, primarily through Oe-Shot Deals and other emergency rental assistance programs.

Funded by the NYS Office of Temporary and Disability Assistance (OTDA), Legal Aid is now expanding ERT's staffing, which will include more attorneys and paralegals to manage its Housing Justice Helpline, which received nearly 18,000 calls from primarily low-income tenants over the past year, according to the organization.

Barbara Guinn, commissioner of the OTDA, said funding the new program is important because it is "critical to our work to reduce homelessness and support family well-being" in the city.

"The launch of The Legal Aid Society's new Emergency Response Team will provide vital legal assistance to tenants when they need it most, helping them avoid eviction, remain in their homes whenever possible, and even cover rental arrears," Guinn said.

NYC Bar Association urges passage of law banning Central Park horse carriages

BY ISABELLA GALLO
igallo@amny.com

The NNYC Bar Association continued its decades-long campaign against New York City's horse-drawn carriages this week, urging the City Council to quickly pass its latest piece of pending legislation to ban them and relieve the equines of their "dangerous and inhumane" job pulling people around Central Park.

It seems its advocacy will be well-received: A City Council spokesperson told amNewYork the legislative body is "prepared to pass the bill" — named Romanch's Law after teen tourist Romanch Mahajan who died after being thrown from a carriage when a horse spooked this June — "at any time." The Council held a July hearing on the bill where Mahajan's family and animal advocates provided emotional testimony in support of banning the equine cabs and is just waiting on the Mayor's Office to finish its environmental review of the bill, a typical procedural step, before bringing it to a vote.

The spokesperson said the Council expects to vote to outlaw the carriages in October.

The City Bar emphasized it would like to see the carriages banned "expeditiously," before more injuries — and legal actions against the city — occur. The bar noted that, while waiting for the Council to take action on the bill, the city saw "yet another incident" of danger created by the carriages when carriage horse Snowman collapsed on Aug. 29.

"The dangers caused by horse-drawn carriages are no longer open for discussion," the City Bar's Animal Law Committee said in a Monday statement. "Legal cases, as well as numerous witnesses at the recent hearing, have established that the dense city environment is inappropriate for horses; that there is routine failure to comply with regulations; that existing regulations are inadequate; and that existing requirements are not adequately enforced."

Romanch's family has sued the city for $105 million over their son's death, alleging negligence and a failure to address safety issues by the city. Earlier this week, owners of carriage horse Deniz, who collapsed and died after allegedly eating a poisonous plant in Central Park, have threatened to sue the city for negligence if the Central Park Conservancy doesn't ensure the plant and other harmful ones like it are removed.

Since 1982, roughly 40 carriage horses have died and dozens more have collapsed or become injured on the job, the Manhattan Borough President's Office reports. Dozens of people, both passengers, bystanders, and handlers, have also been injured as a result of horses collapsing or bolting because they were scared by traffic or other city noise.

Romanch's Law has more public and political will behind it than any other recent push to ban the carriages. It's gained the support of over half of the city's council members, including Council Speaker Julie Menin, as well as Mayor Zohran Mamdani, who has said he supports the "spirit" of the bill though he'd like to see it include more support for the carriage workers who'd be out of a job.

The proposed ban — which would go into effect June 1, 2028 — has drawn opposition from some carriage drivers and the Transport Workers Union that represents them, who said banning the carriages would "strip blue-collar workers of their jobs and offers nothing in return" when testifying at an emotional July hearing on the bill. A representative for Council Member Chris Marte, who introduced the bill, told amNewYork the Council is working on language to expand protections for workers.

A personal reflection on Gloria Steinem, and her influence on the courts

BY HON. E. DANIELLE JOSE-DECKER

Much was written about Gloria Steinem, who died on Sept. 2 at her home in New York City at 92, as a journalist, as the co-founder of Ms. magazine, the National Women's Political Caucus, and the Ms. Foundation, and as a recipient of the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

I want to note something narrower, and closer to our work in the courts.

On May 6, 1970, Steinem testified before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments in support of the Equal Rights Amendment. She spent most of her testimony taking apart what she called sex-based myths, and she made a point of observing that, like racial myths, they had already been written into our laws. Her conclusion was this: the law makes much more sense when it decides to deal with "individuals, not groups bundled together by some condition of birth."

That is not a slogan. It is a description of what we are supposed to be doing in our courtrooms.

The lesson holds 56 years later because the myths rarely announce themselves. They do not arrive in a courtroom labeled as bias.

They arrive as an assumption about which litigant is credible, which parent is the natural caretaker, which witness is emotional and which is merely forceful, and about which attorney can be talked over three times in an hour without anyone noticing. They arrive as a shortcut, and shortcuts are what a busy calendar invites.

Gender fairness work is the daily discipline of refusing that shortcut. It is the deliberate practice of seeing the individual in front of us rather than the category we expect.

I want to say a word to our Town and Village Court justices, in particular. In many of our neighborhoods, you are the only judge a person will ever appear before, often without counsel, frequently at night, and usually on the worst day of that person's year. The protections that operate elsewhere in the system, the appellate record, the second set of eyes, the attorney who knows the practice, are thinner in your courtrooms.

Judge E. Danielle Jose-Decker was appointed March 13, 2026, as administrative judge of the Third Judicial District.

That places the burden Steinem described squarely on you, individually, in the moment. It is real work, and it is not always visible.

Steinem did the public, national, structural version of that work. Our work is quieter and happens one case at a time, in courtrooms across the 3rd Judicial District. It is the same work.

Her family remembered her yesterday as an independent spirit who kept working for equality until the end. We can honor that best by continuing the work in the rooms we are responsible for.

Hon. E. Danielle Jose-Decker is the Administrative Judge of the Third Judicial District.

For attorney and playwright Sophia Murashkovsky Romma, law and art are a 'natural' complement

BY MAX PARROTT
mparrott@amny.com

It's rare for lawyers to begin their career trajectory in experimental theater, but to listen to Sophia Murashkovsky Romma describe her practice, it's a direct extension of her art and advocacy.

Romma is a human-rights lawyer, filmmaker, playwright, and educator whose legal work and art are dedicated to telling the story of persecution, exile, and displacement of immigrants from Eastern Europe. She describes law and art as two interconnected sides of her greater mission as an advocate. Both seek to preserve human dignity and confront injustice.

"I really see those two sides of my life as one pursuit because whether I'm practicing or telling a story or reading a story, I'm trying to illuminate the human experience, and give voice to people who may not otherwise be heard and confront injustice," Romma said. "I do it in film, I do it in theater, and I do it in law. The instruments are different, per se, but the purpose is the same."

Romma's path was irrevocably shaped by her family's immigration to New York from the Soviet Union when she was six years old. She found her voice working within the realm of oral history to tell stories about immigration, assimilation, and identity as she established herself as a playwright and writer in the orbit of the Lower East Side's La MaMa Experimental Theatre Club. Her early artistic work relied heavily on sourcing stories of real people — a practice she associates with mentors including Anna Deavere Smith and Leslie Lee.

But in working closely with the stories of people struggling with the psychological scars and real threats of oppressive government regimes, Romma began to explore how she could improve those lives when they were stuck in limbo, and needed legal help.

"In filmmaking and playwriting, I've dealt with war, displacement, trauma, and gender identity and injustice… Those stories made me increasingly interested in what happens when the people behind them actually need protection and what the law can do for them because law gave me another language for advocacy," Romma said.

Playwright makes human rights her focus in law

By the time she went to law school, she was in her early 40s with an impressive resume as a playwright. Though she was the oldest student at Fordham Law, Romma felt right at home studying human rights and international law as a natural next step of her calling.

Her legal practice as a human rights and international justice advocate specializes in refugee protection, migration law, and the rights of women and children affected by conflict. Her clients are primarily international, often located across Eastern Europe and former Soviet republics, including Ukraine, Georgia, Armenia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and other regions. Romma said her work involves both representing individuals as well as broader advocacy through the New York City Bar Association, international institutions, policy work and research.

When she works with individual clients, Romma said her advocacy is "personal and fact-specific" and sometimes involves connecting them with counsel in their native country or countries where they have taken refuge. For instance, Romma worked with a group of Ukrainian women and children living in Tallinn, Estonia during the production of her recent documentary "Soul Arbitration". She built trust with the women slowly by living with them, eating and talking with them about their lives.

Romma does not advertise her services broadly but relies largely on word of mouth and her human rights and academic networks for referrals. She said she works closely with other human rights advocates and counselors, but her work is distinct from social workers or psychologists. In her conversations with refugees, she works to create "a clear cohesive record of the facts" as it pertains to their case whether it's related to asylum or gender-based violence.

Attorney-client privilege allows Romma to assure her clients that they are safe to tell their whole story, even the parts that are "difficult or unfavorable." In soliciting these stories, Romma said that she has come to see "law not merely as a profession, but as a sacred instrument through which we can grant a voice to people whose plight might otherwise remain unheard."

"For me, the law is at its most meaningful when it restores agency to people who might otherwise have none within the systems affecting their lives.." Romma said. "It's not that it's a celestial microphone hanging from the sky, but it is that sacred instrument that allows you as an advocate or as a human rights attorney to provide that microphone to people so that they can speak out and not be afraid because they have someone to stand over them and with them."

On the bar's United Nations Committee

Romma has turned these experiences into policy work, publishing draft statements on migratory rights and refugee safeguards for the NYC Bar and UN-related advocacy initiatives. She serves as Chair of the United Nations Committee of the New York City Bar Association, where she oversees the bar's output on international legal accountability.

But before she was either an artist or a lawyer, Romma herself was an emigrée. She came to the United States with her mother in 1979 at age six, fleeing discrimination against their Roma and Jewish ancestry. They settled on Manhattan's Upper West Side with support from refugee-resettlement programs.

Her family followed the path of her grandparents, who had both sought asylum in the U.S. due to repression under the Soviet Union. She said her grandfather spent 10 years in a gulag, and two in a prison for "enemies of the state" along with her grandmother. Her grandparents eventually emigrated under President John F. Kennedy.

Building a new life in a new country is full of trials. Romma's mother, a microbiologist by training, struggled with the language barrier and couldn't find work in her field, and took on jobs like giving massages and cleaning other people's homes.

NEW YORK CITY BAR ASSOCIATION

Consul General of Serbia Vladimir Bozovic with Professor Sophia Romma, Ph.D., Esq., chair of the United Nations Committee and Director of the film, Soul Arbitration; a representative of the Consulate General of Malaysia, and Christina Chelliah at a May event.

"Having gone through the asylum process with my own family gave me an early comprehension that behind every legal trial is a family living with uncertainty," Romma said. "You're navigating unfamiliar institutions while carrying this fear, this loss, and this enormous responsibility of rebuilding a life that isn't your own, and that gives it, that gives you even more immediacy and more responsibility for another person's life."

In the countries where Romma works, the phrase "rule of law" doesn't carry the same significance as it does in the U.S., she said, so her work oftentimes involves exploring that concept with her clients and connecting the individual case to the appropriate domestic or international protections.

She said, above all, she believes advocacy to go beyond a client's legal interests, to protect their voice, dignity, privacy, and in some cases their safety. For Romma, the lawyer seeks justice while the artist seeks understanding. She believes artistic training has helped her interpret people's motives and vulnerabilities. On the other hand, legal work has deepened her understanding of institutional failure as an artist.

"I think it may be an unusual combination, but for me it feels completely natural," she said.

Privacy price of smart glasses for the disabled is too high

OP-ED

BY MICHAEL PASTOR

Smart glasses, or glasses with built-in compute capacity, cameras, sound equipment, and AI integration, present breathtaking opportunities to improve the lives of those with visual or hearing impairments. But people who could benefit from this technology rightly have concerns about what happens to the vast amount of data the glasses will collect as they go about their daily lives. Lawmakers should step in.

When compared to use cases for those who do not have visual or hearing impairments, which often are not very compelling (e.g., mobile gaming), the use cases for smart glasses like those offered by Meta for those with visual or hearing impairments strike as immensely impactful. We can envision blind or visually impaired people using smart glasses, when connected to the internet via Bluetooth to their phones, to take in vast information about their surroundings as they move about. With AI, they might be able to interact with the glasses to query for impediments in their path, directions about where they are located or going, and dangers such as poorly marked intersections. Hearing-impaired people could similarly use the glasses to pull in auditory information such as sirens from nearby emergency vehicles.

At the same time, to maximize the benefit of these interactions, hearing- and visually impaired people would feel compelled to share extensive and highly personal information with the devices. So, for example, they might query: "How much further until I arrive at my doctor's office at X location?" If left unregulated, the device company would collect this query and other important personal information, which, if aggregated, would raise stark privacy and cybersecurity implications.

Those with these impairments should not be forced into this quandary. Lawmakers here in New York and elsewhere should develop and enact laws that minimize collection of data of this type, prohibit the sharing or monetizing of this data, and require prompt destruction of all data unnecessary for the user's maximized experience. Lawmakers could conduct hearings on how best to frame such laws so that they do not reduce the obvious benefits smart glasses might offer the hearing and visually impaired. There is surely a balance to strike. But if done right, such laws would free up those with visual and hearing impairments to engage fully with the devices without fear of surveillance or that their personal data might someday be hacked.

Potential objections to such a law do not withstand scrutiny. Opponents might argue that smart glasses manufacturers need to keep and use the data to monetize the product. But smart glasses are already quite expensive. The companies can make significant revenue from the sale of the device in the same way Apple makes revenue at the time of the hardware purchase. Given the extensive data these devices will collect, privacy concerns ought to trump profit motives.

Other states are already turning their eye to regulation of smart glasses. Louisiana has adopted a law requiring that any person using a smart glasses device to record must notify the other person in the conversation that the device is recording video. This seems sensible. The policy case for improving privacy protections for those using such devices rests on similarly solid ground (and this type of law could compliment rather than conflict with other laws concerning unauthorized recording or surveillance.)

The possibilities for wearable technology for people with visual and hearing impairments are extraordinary. These glasses can empower people with these impairments to increase independence and engagement with their world in ways that may be closed to them now. Let's not force them to give up their privacy rights in exchange for this revolutionary technological opportunity.
